

23 March 2009

About the BVA

The British Veterinary Association is the national representative body for the veterinary profession with over 11,000 members. In promoting and supporting the interest of its members, and the animals under their care, the BVA is committed to developing and maintaining channels of communication not least with government, parliamentarians and the media.

The BVA's principal objectives include the promotion and advancement of veterinary science; the collection and dissemination of news and information; and the publication of material relating to veterinary science.